

The Cross and Flame

When The Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren Church merged in 1968 to form The United Methodist Church, the new church adopted the “cross and flame” symbol. This emblem, which is seen on church signs around the world, illustrates that United Methodists relate to God through Christ (the cross) and the Holy Spirit (the flame).

The two tongues of fire that come together as a single flame symbolize the two churches that came together to form The United Methodist Church. The flame also reminds United Methodist of the experience that John Wesley (the founder of Methodism) had in 1738 while listening to a preacher at a meeting on London’s Aldersgate Street. Wesley felt his heart “strangely warmed” and knew that he had been saved by God’s grace.
